3. What the media said

↑ Contents

In short: Coverage on 10 November was overwhelmingly dominated by the third Syria-Jordan Higher Coordination Council, with outlets across the spectrum detailing eleven new agreements spanning trade, education, agriculture and rail links. Security coverage focused on repeated Israeli incursions in Quneitra and Daraa alongside a security operation against former regime remnants in Tartus. Ordinary Syrians, however, were far more preoccupied with denials over a possible military deployment to Yemen and worsening winter fuel costs, topics that received comparatively little direct media attention.

Security

Security coverage centred on Israeli incursions: Syria TV reported strikes near Beit Jinn, Anadolu Agency, Turkish state-run, reported an incursion into rural Quneitra with searches of passersby, and Syria TV and Enab Baladi described a deeper incursion into Wadi al-Raqqad in Daraa amid heavy gunfire. Separately, al-Ariyha English, Arab News and Asharq al-Awsat reported Syrian security forces killed the leader of an armed cell linked to the former regime in a Tartus ambush. The Syria Report found US funding to fight ISIS in Idlib, with only 377 percent of 2025 funds disbursed and none yet in 2026, while the Foundation for Defense of Democracies, a hawkish pro-Israel think tank, warned that Syria's new regional alliances risk embroiling it in new conflicts. The Syrian Observer, an independent outlet, reported conflicting accounts over a possible Syrian military role in Yemen, and ReliefWeb reported four children killed by landmines in under a week, double the earlier weekly average.

Economy

Economic coverage was dominated by the Syria-Jordan agreements: Arab News, Daily Sabah, Turkish state-affiliated, and Syria TV, Syrian state-run, all reported eleven deals signed covering trade, railways and agriculture, while The New Arab noted discussion of a joint industrial zone. The Syria Report reported Saudi Arabia pledged 403 million dollars in concessional loans alongside a new defence pact, and SANA, Syrian state-run, cited experts saying the loans support economic recovery. The National and Arab News reported the reopening of the Syria-Lebanon Dabboussieh crossing after two years, expected to handle up to 10,000 travellers daily. SANA reported the first Syrian Airlines flight from Berlin in 14 years, and The Syria Report noted a temporary ban on orange imports to protect local agriculture.

Governance

Governance coverage was almost entirely shaped by the Jordan visit: The National al-Arabi and Sham Network, citing Jordan's former prime minister al-Khasawneh, said relations are at their best level in three decades, while Halab Today and Zaman al-Wasl detailed memoranda on education and scholarships. Enab Baladi, an independent Syrian outlet, examined whether the Democratic Union Party's position will conflict Washington's opening toward Syria. Syria TV and Al-Modon reported Damascus's fourth criminal court decided to try Sulaiman Hilal al-Assad in absentia as part of transitional justice, while Al-Watan Online cited the Syrian Network for Human Rights saying settlements with those involved in serious crimes conflict with international standards. ReliefWeb reported a coordinated public health response after poliovirus detection in Deir Ezzor, and The Syria Report noted 939 civil society organisations registered with the Ministry of Social Affairs in 2025.

How they compare

While the media focused heavily on the Jordan agreements, framing them largely as diplomatic progress, Syrians online discussed them more skeptically, linking them explicitly to resolving the deadly Jordanian strike dispute rather than treating them as a standalone achievement. The biggest gap was over Yemen: up to 38 percent of people's posts concerned denials of Syrian troop deployment there, a topic barely touched by the media items reviewed beyond The Syrian Observer and references to a Mecca Pact. Winter fuel costs and electricity rationing, described by Syrians in among the angriest terms of the week, had no direct counterpart in the media sample, a notable omission given its scale in public discussion. Syrians were also far more agitated over Israeli incursions in Quneitra, expressing alarm and weary resignation, than the comparatively matter-of-fact media reports suggested, and many welcomed the Berlin flight resumption and Lebanon crossing reopening in tones more celebratory than the media's neutral framing.
